

Get the Best Out of Your Experience — and Your Money

How to Work With a Financial Planner

by Alexandra Armstrong, CFP

Much has been written about how you can select a good financial planner (see the April and May BetterInvesting issues). But little is written about how to maximize your experience once you've made your selection. Some people think incorrectly that financial planning means just obtaining a financial plan and then the job's done.

As we've emphasized in the past, the financial plan is just the starting point of the relationship. To achieve your lifetime financial goals, it's important that the planner and client work together effectively for a long time, typically the rest of your life. Here are some suggestions to establish and maintain a successful relationship with your financial planner.

Provide All the Financial Information That the Planner Requests of You

The more accurate the information you provide your planner, the more accurate your financial plan will be. If you give us incomplete or inaccurate data, we may reach inaccurate conclusions. If we find there's been an error, we'll have to redo the plan. Since most planners charge an hourly rate, this can increase your costs.

For instance, for us to know how much of your mortgage payment will be tax-deductible each year, we need to see your mortgage agreement. That way we can determine what kind of mortgage you have, the amount borrowed, the date you took it out, the term of the mortgage and the current interest rate. Just knowing your balance due and your interest rate isn't sufficient.

For another example more personal in nature, it's important we know whether in the future you might have to support a parent, sibling or handicapped child in addition to yourself.

Be Honest With Your Adviser About Your Financial Goals, Risk Tolerance and Attitudes Toward Different Kinds of Investments

To construct an effective financial plan, we need you to define and prioritize your financial goals. If you really want to retire at 55 rather than wait to age 65, say so. Based on your current situation, your planner may tell you that it may not be financially possible to retire at 55. But if retiring at that age is really your priority, your planner can help you determine what the shortfall is and what remedial action you might take to retire at that age, or at least sooner rather than later. A compromise solution might be proposed such as working part time if that's feasible.

There's no right or wrong attitude toward taking risk.

It's all right to declare yourself conservative or a risk-taker — although we find clients' attitudes toward taking risk changes in direct relation to whether their assets are gaining or losing value. What's important is to tell your planner the way you really feel.

Many planners will ask you to take a risk-tolerance test. We'd urge you to take it. If you're married or have a partner, both of you should take it, as you may find the results surprising. Often we find that one partner's more of a risk-taker than the other.

Because of experiences you, your family or friends have had, you may want to avoid a particular type of investment. There's more than one way to achieve successful investment results, so if your planner knows you'd prefer not to make one investment over another, this can be factored into your recommendations.

On the other hand, your planner may point out that a particular investment might not have been a good one in the past, but today it's a good one because of a change in structure or economic conditions. Try to keep an open mind in this regard.

Ask Questions if You Don't Understand What the Planner Is Telling You — Even if You Think the Questions Seem Naive

There's no such thing as a stupid question — you're merely asking a question about a subject in which you lack expertise. After all, you wouldn't be paying the planner for advice if you thought you had the knowledge or time to do it yourself.

The planner might assume that you're more financially knowledgeable than you are, so it's your job to tell your planner when you don't understand.

Once you receive the written plan, if it doesn't reflect your situation accurately or you've changed your mind since you started the financial-planning process, tell your planner so that adjustments can be made. As mentioned above, the financial plan should be a starting point in achieving your financial goals. The plan can and should be modified over time as your situation changes. Most financial planners charge an hourly rate for their work, but once the basic information is in the computer, the information can be changed relatively easily.

On the Other Hand, Don't Get Carried Away With Running Multiple Scenarios

Sometimes clients aren't sure when they hope to retire and they want to perform several "what if" calculations. These questions might include: "What if I retire at age 55, or 60 or 65? What if we move to Florida and rent our current home? What if we buy a second home?" Although the plan document is designed to be flexible, you can spend a lot of money having these additional scenarios considered. Before meeting with the planner, think through what your goals really are. Once you've seen the results, the plan can be modified.

Don't Procrastinate — Implement the Planner's Recommendations as Soon as Possible

Before agreeing to work with your financial planner, we presume you did your homework and have confidence that this planner knows what she's doing. Thus, when the planner gives you advice, follow it. If you have questions about the recommendations, discuss them with the planner immediately. If you wait six months to implement the advice, another set of recommendations might be more appropriate. Advice such as updating your will would still be relevant, but a guidance to shift from one investment to another within your plan could change.

Inform Your Planner About Any Financial Changes in Your Life

We presume you'd notify your financial planner about any big financial event in your life such as inheriting money or losing your job. But you need to tell your planner about other financial changes such as the fact you've started to send monthly checks to your father, who recently was diagnosed with Parkinson's disease, or that you're helping a child whose marriage is floundering. Your financial planner might have to adjust your plan to reflect these financial changes but more importantly also might be able to give you advice as to how to best handle these events based on similar experience with other clients facing these problems.

Call Your Planner Before You Make Any Major Financial Decisions

Sometimes clients tell us after the fact that they've refinanced their home, leased a car or provided a loan to a family member. Since the planner knows your total picture, he or she can help you decide whether to take the action you're contemplating and, even more importantly, how to do it most effectively. For instance, if you're going to loan a friend or family member money, you should draw up a formal agreement. That way, if you aren't repaid, you can deduct the loss on your tax return. Planners would prefer not to tell clients after the fact that they shouldn't have taken a particular action or that they did it the wrong way. It's better to ask first, even if the planner agrees that your decision is the right one.

Treat Your Planner and the Staff Members as You'd Like to Be Treated

Although your financial planner wants to be responsive to you, some problems you may face are more crucial than others. Try to distinguish between them when you contact your planner. Keep in mind that planners have other equally important clients who may need advice as well. For instance, if it appears a dividend hasn't been credited to your account correctly, email the planner with your question. It often takes some time for someone in the office to find out what happened and to reply.

On the other hand, if you're leaving town tomorrow and must get an immediate answer to a pressing question, say so. Try not to wait until the last minute to ask for help. For example, if you're missing a cost for something you sold last year and need that information to prepare your tax return, don't wait until April 14 to ask. Email your planner earlier in the year. If you find that your planner or a staff member consistently doesn't respond in a timely fashion, you should complain about this lack of service either to the person involved or to the office manager.

Recognize the Need for Regular Reviews of Your Financial Plan

Although it may not be necessary to have a comprehensive written financial plan each year, it's important to visit with your planner annually to discuss any changes in your life that would affect your plan.

At this time, your planner will discuss with you changes in the economy or tax law that would warrant modification of your existing plan and investments.

Conclusion: Maximizing the Relationship With Your Planner

Finding the right planner is well worth the investment of your time and money. To maximize the relationship, make sure that you're communicating effectively with each other. Just as when you work with other professional advisers, if you and your planner are on the same wavelength, you'll be able to achieve your goals more easily. B

Alexandra Armstrong is a CERTIFIED FINANCIAL PLANNER and chairman and founder of Armstrong, Fleming & Moore, Inc., a registered investment advisory firm located at 1800 M St. N.W., Suite 1010-S, Washington, D.C. 20036-5813, 202/887-8135.

Securities are offered through Commonwealth Financial Network, member FINRA/SIPC.

Investment advisory services are offered through Armstrong, Fleming & Moore Inc., an SEC-registered investment adviser not affiliated with Commonwealth Financial Network. Consult your personal financial adviser before making any decisions.

Ms. Armstrong can't answer individual inquiries, but welcomes suggestions for future article topics.

This material has been provided for general informational purposes only and doesn't constitute either tax or legal advice.

Investors should consult a tax or legal professional regarding their individual situation. Examples are hypothetical and for illustrative purposes only. No specific investments were used in the examples. Actual results will vary.

